

Dear Chairman Pai and Members of the Federal Communication Commission,

I am writing to voice my opposition to the FCC's call to repeal the provisions in the 2015 Open Internet Order related to "net neutrality." Specifically, I support the FCC including the ISPs and the internet under Title II of the Telecommunications Act. The internet, and the internet service provider's who provide access to the content on the internet, are indeed public utilities—they are essential to modern society and are public goods and should be regulated as such. The FCC has an obligation to ensure that internet companies operate in the public interest, and the repeal of Title II and the allowing ISP's the rights of prioritization, throttling and blocking does not serve the public interest. Enabling an open internet in which each user is free to choose and prioritize their own content is the best way to ensure the internet will continue to innovate as well as operate freely and democratically.

I urge the FCC to vote against the repeal of the Open Internet Order and the rules preventing prioritization, throttling, and blocking, as well as to maintain the Title II provisions regarding ISP regulation.

Thank you.
